CQU'S HEALTH INFORMATICS RESEARCH GROUP

CQU's Health Informatics Research Group conducts research to improve health through health informatics education and research.

The group provides:

- multidisciplinary educational and research opportunities to build the nation's health informatics capability and uptake;
- adopts innovative teaching and learning technologies to provide up to date realistic health informatics content based on industry needs;
- fosters multidisciplinary applied research where outcomes are used within the health industry; and
- provides expert advice and contributes to national and international developments as key players and leaders.

CQU's Health and Informatics Research Group is involved in Health IT standards and minimum dataset development for Electronic Health Records, universal Health Informatics education, nursing informatics and the evaluation of the impact of IT on health.

The group is currently involved in the evaluation of consumer and provider perspectives for the HealthConnect North Queensland Trial.
